Reflection of the week: Week 01

What did I learn this week?

During this week, I became familiar with the teaching environment and began working with students from Grade 9, Matriculation, and First Year. I started teaching English grammar by introducing the basic parts of speech and explaining their functions through simple examples. I encouraged students to answer questions and identify grammatical forms in sentences. This experience helped me understand that students have different levels of prior knowledge, so a teacher needs to explain concepts clearly, use familiar examples, and check understanding during the lesson. I also learned that a supportive classroom atmosphere can help students participate more confidently.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will continue teaching the parts of speech one topic at a time and provide more examples and short exercises. I will ask questions throughout the lesson to check students' understanding rather than waiting until the end. I will also try to involve quieter students, give clear instructions, and use brief revision activities to help students remember the concepts.

Reflection of the week: Week 02

What did I learn this week?

During this week, I continued teaching parts of speech, including pronouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions, using definitions, examples, and sentence-based exercises. I reviewed previous lessons and invited students to ask questions about topics they found difficult. I also used oral questioning and written practice to check their understanding. This experience helped me recognise the importance of regular revision and connecting grammatical rules with practical examples. I learned that students benefit when a lesson moves from a simple explanation to guided practice and then to independent examples.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will continue reviewing the parts of speech before moving further into sentence structure and tenses. I will prepare short exercises that allow students to apply each concept, identify common errors, and correct them. I will also check understanding more frequently and adjust my explanations when students appear confused.

Reflection of the week: Week 03

What did I learn this week?

During this week, I reviewed the grammar topics covered earlier and began introducing tenses. I explained that tenses help express the time of an action or situation, then used simple examples to distinguish present, past, and future meanings. I guided students in forming sentences and identifying tense patterns. I learned that tenses can be challenging because students may memorise structures without fully understanding when to use them. Clear examples, comparisons, and repeated practice are therefore important for helping learners understand both form and meaning.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will continue teaching the different tense forms, including simple and continuous forms, through examples related to students' daily lives. I will use short oral questions, sentence-completion tasks, and transformation exercises to assess understanding. I will also revisit difficult points before introducing new material so students can build their knowledge step by step.

Reflection of the week: Week 04

What did I learn this week?

During this week, I continued teaching tenses and helped students practise forming sentences in different time frames. I explained tense patterns through examples and corrected errors during guided exercises. I observed that students need opportunities to use grammar actively, not only copy rules from the board. This week helped me reflect on the value of patient explanation, repetition, and constructive feedback. It also reminded me to consider the different learning needs of Grade 9, Matriculation, and First Year students when choosing examples and the level of difficulty.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will review the tense forms already taught and give students mixed exercises so they can distinguish between them. I will identify recurring errors and explain why they occur. I will also begin or continue active and passive voice, depending on students' readiness, using clear sentence pairs and guided transformations.

Reflection of the week: Week 05

What did I learn this week?

During this week, I continued grammar instruction and worked on active and passive voice. I explained how the focus of a sentence changes when it is transformed from active to passive voice, and I used examples to show the relationship between the subject, verb, and object. Students practised transforming suitable sentences with guidance. This lesson helped me understand that students need to recognise sentence structure before they can change it accurately. I also learned that checking each step and discussing mistakes can make a difficult grammar topic easier to understand.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will revise the rules of active and passive voice and provide additional transformation exercises. I will ask students to explain the changes they make, not just give the final answer. I will also continue reviewing tenses where necessary, since correct tense knowledge supports accurate voice transformation.
